In the selection process, priority was given to students whose research topics are well-suited to qualitative methods, as well as those who have a clear interest in exploring specific social issues or social phenomena. At the same time, a number of applicants proposed topics that may be more appropriately addressed using quantitative methods (e.g., social experiments or surveys). There were many applications from students primarily studying business and marketing. However, this course is not specifically designed to focus on market (user needs) research or business-oriented problem solving skills. Instead, in this course, students will conduct a pilot study aimed at analyzing social structures and cultural norms through people's lived experiences, meaning-making processes, and media representations. I felt there might be a gap between what you hope to learn and what this course can offer.
